1 Identification of individuals

In many countries, individuals can be identified with a unique number. This identification number last with the individual throughout their lifetime. This number could be a personal ID number, a tax identification number or a national ID number. No matter which number is used, it needs to be in the correct format for that country. For example, with the correct format one could not write a Swedish personal number with 14 digits and signs. There is a specific format, and that should be used.

The correct format of an individual identification number is of great importance to a greater extent be sure that the individual is indeed the individual he or she claims to be and comes from that specific country. Table 1 indicates which identification number the applicant should fill in when applying for a ID06 card. Each identification number is named to help the applicant to understand which number that is required to fill in.

Certain countries don't have a specific identification number. Other countries don't have a unique number and uses several different numbers. In those cases, where one strong and unique identification number couldn't be found, the tax identification number TIN has been used. In certain countries, the TIN number is the identification number for that country.

It is of great importance that the information about the individual is correct when ordering a ID06 card.
